Bioventure commits to Life Science City Goettingen

and unveils plans for a million-euro investment at the location.

Accompanied by representatives from GWG (Society for economic and urban development Goettingen), the mayor of Goettingen, Petra Broistedt, visited Bioventure. The company reported on current developments and challenges as well as plans for the construction of a new company headquarters in Goettingen.

Bioventure is an internationally operating company specializing in financing groundbreaking biomedicine companies and research projects. The company gathers a variety of investors to bring significant and promising projects to market maturity.

"When expecting guests whom we want to convince of a multi-million euro investment, as well as for recruiting leaders in biotechnology to work in our company, it definitely takes more than our current facilities offer. We want to create optimal conditions for a modern work environment," says Bioventure partner Nico Straub.

Mayor Petra Broistedt emphasized that the life sciences are shaping Goettingen like no other economic sector. A quarter of all jobs are located here. Innovative research and startups originate from the life sciences. An investment company participating in biotech firms, such as those on the brink of breakthroughs in HIV cure through genome editing, reducing mortality from pneumonia, or developing a side-effect-free and orally available alternative to the currently widely sold weight loss injection, fits perfectly into the portfolio.

"In light of the excellent forecasts in business development, time is pressing at Bioventure. We also want to continue our further growth at the economic and scientific location of Goettingen in the heart of Germany," emphasizes founder and CEO Dr. Erik Hoppe.
